SPECIALIST SERVICE

John Myatt Woodwind was established 25 years ago by freelance multi-instrumentalist/teacher John Myatt and extended to 'Brass' within two years.

After nearly thirty years teaching, John felt well qualified to work on a retail business that had the interests of musicians and teachers at the forefront and this remains the central strand underpinning everything we do.

Some retailers have a policy of supplying instruments still in the unopened box as received from the manufacturer. This means that the overheads incurred in setting up are drastically reduced and the price can be correspondingly more competitive.

We believe this to be a short-sighted and flawed policy and would like to illustrate the advantage that the purchaser receives when dealing with a reputable specialist supplier by going through briefly what happens when we receive a new saxophone:

On receipt and unpacking of the instrument, there is a careful visual inspection of the instrument and case. Corks are removed, the instrument is played from top to bottom, minor adjustments are made by the instrumental specialist including balancing and regulating the action. If more serious remedial work (eg seating of pads, G# adjustment and general once over) is required the instrument is taken to the workshop.

When work is completed it goes back to the specialist who again plays from top to bottom - if still not satisfactory it goes back to the workshop; otherwise accessories (reeds, pull through etc.) are added and the instrument is put on the shelf and offered for sale. If an order is received it is once again played before despatch.

We recommend returning new instruments for a checkup 6 - 8 weeks after purchase and again before the expiry of the guarantee.
